

Toys?

for lighters?

This information brought to you
 by a partnership of
 National Association of State Fire Marshals
 Oregon Office of State Fire Marshal
 United States Fire Administration

Toys?

for lighters?

This information brought to you
 by a partnership of
 National Association of State Fire Marshals
 Oregon Office of State Fire Marshal
 United States Fire Administration

What is the problem?

Toylike lighters are readily available in places like convenience stores, gas stations, hardware stores and some craft stores. They are easily mistaken for toys. Experience has shown that adults and children find them intriguing. Many of them have lights, visual effects and sounds, making them even more attractive to children. Some resemble toys or cartoon characters familiar to children such as Gumby, a rubber ducky and Nemo. In the hands of a child, toylike lighters can be deadly. Some incidents involving toylike lighters include:

- A six-year-old in North Carolina sustained second degree burns using a lighter that looked like a cell phone.
- In Oregon, a home was destroyed by a fire set by a child using a lighter that looked like a horse.
- In Maine, a boy mistook a lighter shaped like a baseball bat for a flashlight and received burns to his eyelid.
- In Arkansas, two toddlers died in a fire they started with a lighter that looked like a motorcycle.

Fast facts

- Over 70 million toylike lighters are imported into the United States annually.
- The European Union banned the sale of toylike lighters as of March 2007. Millions more of these lighters will likely be for sale in the U.S. as a result.
- Nationally, over 13,000 home fires are started by youths annually. (Source: NFPA)

What you can do to help

- Educate yourself about the issue and don't purchase toylike lighters. Ask retailers to not sell them in your community.
- Write to your elected representatives and ask for their support in prohibiting the sale and distribution of toylike lighters at state and national levels.
- Contact the Consumer Product Safety Commission and ask them to ban the importation of toylike lighters.

What is the problem?

Toylike lighters are readily available in places like convenience stores, gas stations, hardware stores and some craft stores. They are easily mistaken for toys. Experience has shown that adults and children find them intriguing. Many of them have lights, visual effects and sounds, making them even more attractive to children. Some resemble toys or cartoon characters familiar to children such as Gumby, a rubber ducky and Nemo. In the hands of a child, toylike lighters can be deadly. Some incidents involving toylike lighters include:

- A six-year-old in North Carolina sustained second degree burns using a lighter that looked like a cell phone.
- In Oregon, a home was destroyed by a fire set by a child using a lighter that looked like a horse.
- In Maine, a boy mistook a lighter shaped like a baseball bat for a flashlight and received burns to his eyelid.
- In Arkansas, two toddlers died in a fire they started with a lighter that looked like a motorcycle.

Fast facts

- Over 70 million toylike lighters are imported into the United States annually.
- The European Union banned the sale of toylike lighters as of March 2007. Millions more of these lighters will likely be for sale in the U.S. as a result.
- Nationally, over 13,000 home fires are started by youths annually. (Source: NFPA)

What you can do to help

- Educate yourself about the issue and don't purchase toylike lighters. Ask retailers to not sell them in your community.
- Write to your elected representatives and ask for their support in prohibiting the sale and distribution of toylike lighters at state and national levels.
- Contact the Consumer Product Safety Commission and ask them to ban the importation of toylike lighters.